A “Pedant” IGN Guide on what you need to do to get better in the game and the course of your league. FIFA is one of the best football games on the market but if you look at it under the lens of a gamer, some of its flaws are more than evident. Let’s go through some of the more egregious ones: The most basic stats of the player are actually not that good. That goes for both the player and team stats. It’ll never quite be as easy as 1-2-3-4 in real life, but the first step for any football gamer should be to memorize the basic stats of the player and team. I can just imagine how often I’d be going to a tournament or cup game and not know the stats of the player on the opposing team! I’m not a football fan, I just play video games. But once I started playing FIFA, I couldn’t play any other football game without knowing how the player I was facing fared. At least you can move around easily using the D-Pad and ZL and ZR. This gets even easier after you get used to the control pad. If you are making a comeback or initiating a dribble, pressing R1 is the key while R2 is used to perform a hook/cross. If the ball is on a pedestal, pressing R3 will tap it. This is one of the most infuriating aspects of FIFA. I never quite got used to it so I stuck to the D-Pad most of the time. But it’s worth getting used to the controls if you find yourself on a fast moving level where you often have no other way to move. You’ll always know how well your team is doing in the league. Do you ever get the feeling that you are not playing on the same level
